The Origins of Old Fashioned Redwork

Old Fashioned Redwork originated in Europe, particularly in Germany and England, during the 18th century. The technique gained popularity due to its simplicity and affordability. Redwork is often executed using a simple stitch called the outline stitch, where the needle follows the design's outline. The thread used is typically a shade of red, hence the name Redwork. However, other monochromatic colors like blue or black were also used occasionally.

This style of embroidery gained prominence in America during the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Redwork became especially popular for creating home decor items, quilt blocks, and even children's clothing. The designs often depicted various themes such as animals, flowers, and intricate patterns.

Discovering Penny Square Embroidery

Penny Square Embroidery is another traditional style that emerged during the same period. Its name comes from the use of small squares, often the size of a penny, to create intricate designs. Crafters would carefully place these squares on a fabric and stitch around their edges, creating a beautiful mosaic effect. Initially, these squares were made from fabric scraps or, as the name suggests, actual pennies. However, over time, specially designed fabric cutouts replaced the need for coins.

Penny Square Embroidery gained immense popularity due to its versatility and visual appeal. The small squares allowed crafters to create intricate geometric designs and floral motifs. It was often used for embellishing clothing, decorative linens, and accessories.
