Throughout history, various cultures and civilizations have explored the principle of causes regarding death. From ancient Egyptian beliefs in the afterlife to the philosophical ponderings of Greek philosophers like Socrates and Plato, the quest to understand the causes of death has shaped human understanding of mortality.

The History of Death

The history of death is a captivating journey that takes us through different civilizations, their rituals, and attempts to explain the haunting phenomenon. It provides insight into the diverse perspectives humans have held regarding the nature of death.

In ancient Mesopotamia, the Sumerians believed that after death, the deceased would enter the "netherworld," a shadowy realm where they are eternally trapped. The Egyptians, on the other hand, developed complex burial rituals and mummification practices to ensure the deceased's smooth transition to the afterlife.

Greek philosophers like Aristotle and Epicurus proposed contrasting theories on death. While Aristotle saw it as the natural end of life, Epicurus argued for the absence of consciousness after death, sparking debates that continue to this day.

Jumping forward in history, we encounter the Middle Ages, where death was perceived as a constant companion due to the rampant spread of diseases like the Black Death. This period witnessed the emergence of various religious movements, such as the Dance of Death, that reminded people of their mortality.

As we move closer to the modern era, death becomes a subject of scientific inquiry. Pioneers like Leonardo da Vinci and William Harvey made groundbreaking discoveries in the field of anatomy, allowing for a deeper understanding of the human body's intricacies and the causes of death.

Unveiling the Truth

Despite centuries of exploration, the principle of causes surrounding death remains shrouded in mystery. Science has shed light on many aspects, but the ultimate cause and nature of death continue to elude us.

The history of Western philosophy contains much wisdom, and the rational substance of all its existential content is that life is change, and change occurs from generation to generation. And life, although different, is the same in all individuals, in such a way that regardless of cultures, religions or nations, the experience of living is a long moment for all human beings.

It is an instant that is drawing a line that is individual life, and that intersects with other lives, creating what we perceive as reality.

The collective reality creates history, and history is determined by certain principles.

Life, collective existence, is a story by itself, the story of a species that is knowing itself over many centuries, learning to recognize itself before the reflection of its own soul, the soul of its history.

This is the book of the Highest Degree of All Principles.
