On the fateful night of April 14, 1912, history was forever altered when the "unsinkable" RMS Titanic collided with an iceberg in the icy waters of the North Atlantic. Among the tales of tragedy and heroism that emerged from that ill-fated voyage, the remarkable story of the black man on the Titanic often goes unnoticed.

Meet Joseph Laroche, born in Cap Haitien, Haiti, on May 26, 1886. Joseph was a remarkable man, breaking barriers and defying societal norms in a time when racial discrimination was rampant. As a successful engineer, he had achieved what many could only dream of: a prosperous life and a promising future. But little did he know that his life was about to collide with one of the most infamous disasters in history.

Joseph, along with his pregnant French wife, Juliette Laroche, and their two daughters, Louise and Simonne, boarded the Titanic as second-class passengers. They were among the few black passengers on board, and their presence on the luxury liner was a testament to their resilience and ambition.
