Not illustrated. 1830 Excerpt: ...on some little hills, the summits of which are crowned with windmills. The air is pure upon these heights: in the town below, it is less so. Filth is suffered to accumulate there, which ought to be conveyed away into the port by subterraneous channels; the consequence is, that the quays are a sort of sewers. Add to which, the town is destitute of good running water. The springs, which are found there in sufficient number, are husbanded by the aqueducts; but this water is not very wholesome, either because the soil which it traverses vitiates its purity, or that the filth which passes over the canals communicates an offensive taste. The water of the wells is briny; they drink only that of the springs and cisterns. "In 1818,' this town, already very large, was prodigiously augmented by accessions of Greeks from Mytelene, the Morea, and several isles of the Archipelago. In 1820, there were computed to be more than 3,000 houses, built with stone, and terrace-roofed, from two to three stories high. But all these houses were placed without any order, and rendered the streets narrow and winding. Almost all the streets were paved, but dirty: some are of a tolerable width, with a foot-way on each side, and a brook in the middle, which was crossed in winter, when swelled by the rains, by means of flying bridges. It was there that all the filth of the houses met, and into this flowed the stinking waters of the oil-mills and the soap-manufactories: these brooks were altogether offensive and noxious. They reckoned at Ai'vali nearly 32,000 settled inhabitants, and 7 or 8,000 strangers resident or passing. The Greek religion was exclusively professed. There was not a single Turk, Armenian, or Jew. The town was under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Ephesus; and ...
